What Does it Take to Teach Generation Z?

Anyone born after 2002 (and therefore post-millennial) are referred to as Generation Z. This is the first generation to be linked into technology from day one. We are now educating a generation of students who are developing into adults surrounded by both the help, expertise and pressures of social media, the internet and advanced technology.

At the same time, this is a generation which lives in a globalized and interconnected world facing severe threats and issues they are concerned about and would like to solve and change.

What needs and demands does this generation bring into the language classroom? What skills do they need to thrive in the world they live in?

It is the aim of this presentation to look into the answers to these questions as we explore classroom practices that best suit Generation Z.

Speaker: Luciana Fernández – Sponsored by Nat Geo Education

Building skills for the real world

We all know that teaching our students to communicate in English successfully is a key life skill; however, this is no easy task. It is an ambitious objective the achievement of which will depend on our strategies to engage students, on how we deal with their social and emotional needs and on the extent to which we bring “the real world” into our classroom.

- What strategies can we use to make everybody work?
- What do we mean by “the real world” today?
- Why do experts believe that GCDEI is the key?

Join us! Let’s discuss ideas that will help young and teenage learners develop the confidence they need to communicate better.
